Prioritising risks: Advice for organisations

OVER THE PAST TWO YEARS, several organisations have confused the management of processes linked to crisis management, business continuity management and risk management. We have witnessed decision-makers failing to understand emergencies that need to be dealt with immediately in order to lower the impact of risks, such as supply chain disruptions linked to Covid developments versus the assessment of water scarcity, and their effect on long term production assets.

At this year's Risk-In Conference, organisations and individuals will be helped so that they can address priorities to increase value of their organisations, implement positive resilience processes and help achieve societal goals.

The conference co-founder, Stéphane Martin, uses the example of his business partner Antoine Lacombe and his brother Julien to illustrate the importance of prioritising risks.

One year ago, they decided to participate in the Transquadra 2022; a sailing race crossing the Atlantic from Marseilles in France with a stop at Funchal, Madeira for the first stage and then from Funchal to Marin in the French West Indies.

After 15 days, 11 hours, 34 minutes and 28 seconds of sleepless nights, a cabin drenched by huge waves, tough winds, being hit by flying fish, torn sails, electricity breakdowns, four sail changes during the night and many other things too numerous to mention, they arrived and although it was their first attempt at the race, they won against 70 other boats.

How could they achieve this feat without perfect risk management, resilience and maybe a bit of recklessness? Public and private organisations should take this as an example. The two brothers were prepared for the unexpected and they had to face it every day and night. They had to back each other up constantly, but each had their own specialities; Antoine was more expert in weather forecasting and choosing the right route, while Julien had developed his expertise more on the mechanical side of things.

They learned how to manage immediate crises such as completely torn sails, along with long term challenges such as following the right path to win the race. Winning, by the way, was not on their agenda.

There were more than 200 supporters in a WhatsApp group who followed and encouraged the two brothers in real time. It was a breath-taking adventure.

At Risk-In Conference 2022, the organisers will address all human, process and system aspects of resilience, security insurance and risk management (see pages 31, 34, 36).

A window on expertise and innovation

THIS YEAR'S EENA CONFERENCE will see more than 100 public safety sector specialists come together to discuss and debate high-level regulatory matters, technical issues and innovative products on the market.

Following last year's successful in-person event, the conference will follow three diverse tracks. The first morning's schedule includes an analysis of the rescue of Danish footballer Christian Eriksen while on the field during UEFA's Euro 2020 championship and an exploration of how emergency medical services dealt with the 2020 Beirut explosion in Lebanon.

CRJ Advisory Panel Members, Eric McNulty and David Wales will be presenting on practical insights for leading through turbulent times and the human experience in video communication with PSAPs, respectively, while Mladen Vratonjic will chair a session on mission critical control rooms.

The CRJ recently hosted a webinar (crisis-response.com/listen) featuring a presentation from Rut Erdelyi, European Director of the Resilience Advisors Network – a CRJ Key Network Partner. At the conference, Rut will be chairing a session on strengthening the engagement of civil society in transforming disaster management, involving an insight into European projects that are working towards stronger, safer communities and increased resilience.

The exhibition area will host more than 35 suppliers, all showcasing their latest technologies and solutions for emergency response and public safety. This, along with the social events, will provide the perfect opportunity to renew acquaintances and network with peers in an informal setting.

There is also the 112 Awards Ceremony, where citizens, responders and emergency services are recognised for their outstanding contributions to public safety.

This year's conference should appeal to those in the field of emergency services and public authority, supplier organisations, researchers and telecom regulators, as well as officials from EU institutions.

■ The conference will take place in Marseilles, France, from April 27 to 29 this year. For more information, visit eenaconference.org
